Directing a play for the first time can be challenging as you are responsible for all creative aspects and its success largely depends on you. This may feel overwhelming, but these tips will help your first play be a success!

1. Script

Either use a play that has already been written or write your own. You will need to distribute copies of the script to the whole cast and crew. If you are using someone else's play, contact their publisher to ensure you are permitted to use it.

B

@dramaboy asked 'What's the best play you've ever seen?' In my case, I was completely blown away by 'Hamilton'. While sick to death of all the hype beforehand, I now know what the fuss was about. Miranda's decision to tell the story of the US founding father, Alexander Hamilton, through hip hop was a touch of genius given such stories can be boring. I also liked how different cultures are represented. If only my history lessons had been like that, I might have paid more attention! #luvhamilton

C

Janner's disturbing production of 'Othello' is set in a modern-day British football club. The protagonists are no longer soldiers, but footballers who seem more interested in outdoing each other than defeating their rivals. The action takes place on the pitch and in their luxurious residences, and sophisticated sound and lighting effects bring the play to life.

D

She hoped the butterflies in her stomach would disappear before she heard the call to go on stage. She had been playing the lead role for three months and had never had this sense of fear before. The impact of the director's words had affected her more than she thought. Perhaps he was hoping to motivate her. But his criticism had had the opposite effect. She had been left doubting her competence and now she was scared stiff of having to face an audience.

E

Pantomime is a theatrical tradition which has divided the British for hundreds of years. 'You either love it or hate it.' On the one hand, you've got the pantomime lovers, who laugh enthusiastically at the pathetic jokes. For some strange reason, they're eager to shout out 'He's behind you!' whenever the villain steps on stage. On the other hand, there are the haters who find no entertainment in the old-fashioned jokes delivered by an actor who once appeared in a soap opera. I've always considered myself a hater, so when my wife suggested taking the kids to the pantomime, the answer was a definitive 'No way.' She could pressurise me all she liked, but I was never going to give in.

The food photography course

As a chef, posting food photos on social media is a great way to share my work with the public. Generally, the feedback has been encouraging, but recently someone posted a negative comment. They complained that the photos looked blurred and it was hard to tell what the dishes were. I was pretty down in the dumps when I realised my photos might be putting people off my food.

The problem is that I've never had any professional photography training. While smartphones are packed with features for taking and editing pictures, they can be overwhelming. Unless you know how to use them properly, the results can be disappointing. Fortunately, there are online courses aimed at those wanting to improve their skills. One promised to show me how to take 'mouth-watering' photos. I didn't think twice before signing up.

It started with an introductory video explaining why food photography is trickier than people think. It was illustrated with dull photos, of how your photos shouldn't look, where all the colours had blended into one. Apparently, the biggest problem for amateur photographers is lighting as we tend to overuse the flash, making the colours look wrong. Colour is essential to our perception of food and the wrong colours will deter us from eating it. What we should be doing is using natural light to illuminate our dishes, for example by sitting next to a window or using a shiny menu to reflect natural light onto your food.

Composition has always been beyond me. However, the course taught me more effective ways of creating visually pleasing shots. For example, most smartphone cameras let you show gridlines on the screen, which help you frame the subject. Another tip I learnt is to use the environment to frame the picture. For example, you should make sure it isn't too crowded by removing unnecessary objects, like dirty plates or ketchup bottles. You should also look out for unusual backgrounds, like tablecloths or tiles with interesting designs, while avoiding patterns that are too busy.

A big advantage of digital photography is that it's easy to edit your pictures. The course presenters suggested taking lots of shots of the same thing, eliminating the worst ones at the editing stage, even an incompetent photographer like me would know that. There were some nice tips about filters, though, like using them to make the foreground look sharper or avoiding those 1970s filters which everyone else uses. Apart from that, this part of the course lacked depth in my opinion. A lot of photo-editing software is available online and I'd have been interested in learning more about that.

The final part of the course dealt with sharing photos on social media. I'm inclined to post loads of photos every day, which probably drives my followers up the wall. A similar example from the course was how many cups of coffee with heart patterns on top are to be found online. The expression, 'You've seen one, you've seen them all' comes to mind. In other words, after seeing the same thing a few times, you stop being engaged. Instead, I learnt that posting fewer yet more original photos, maybe one or two a day, is more likely to entice people to follow you.

8 Read the blog post again. Circle the correct answer (A or B).

0 How did the author feel about his past attempts to share food photographs on social media?

A He wanted to eliminate the images which had been criticised.	B He was unhappy about the possible negative impact of his images.

1 What does the author say about the photographs used in the introductory video?

A They showed how light can make food appear boring.	B They had been taken by an amateur photographer.

2 What has the author learnt about composition?

A Smartphones tend to let too much light into photographs.	B Manipulating the area behind the subject can make a photograph more attractive.

3 How does the author feel about the advice on editing on the course?

A It might have been useful for incompetent photographers.	B It should have included more information on how to edit photographs.

4 What does the author say about sharing photographs on social media?

A Posting too many images can be frustrating for followers.	B Few people are likely to be enticed by images of food or drink.
