3 disagrees with Tamara's views about always doing what you say you will do? ___
4 has the same opinion as Ricardo about growing your professional network? ___

/8

Careers Advice

Four professionals offer advice for people starting new careers.

A Susan, physicist
Nowadays we're beginning to hear more about the value of lifelong learning. To me it's all about recognising our instinct to improve our understanding of the world around us. It drives us to gather more information and experiment with different ways of doing things. It's completely normal for scientists like myself to do that because, if we didn't, science would never advance. It seems to me that the same principle should also be applied to other professions. At the same time, it's important to keep a sense of perspective on your job and not let it control your life. Personally, the way companies expect more and more of us drives me up the wall. For example, I was reading an article recently about how employees should always do what they say they will do. It put me on edge a bit because I've witnessed colleagues struggling to complete tasks which they'd offered to do. They didn't ask for help because they were worried about looking unreliable. In my opinion, you shouldn't feel ashamed to tell your boss if you've been too ambitious in taking on tasks.

B Dejan, chef
Some people say that no matter what you're doing, you shouldn't stop reflecting on your career. In other words, you should keep asking yourself whether you're happy in your job and if there's anything you should be doing to fulfil your potential. Personally, I'm not convinced that's a good idea because it can't be productive to keep thinking about things all the time. Working in a fast-paced environment like I do, you just need to get on with it. Can you imagine what our customers would say if they ordered a soufflé and we were all sitting around worrying about our careers? That said, there are more practical ways of developing professionally. I've always said that in work it's not about what you know, but who you know. The more contacts you have, the more likely you are to open up new professional opportunities. That's why I always try to socialise with other people in my industry. In fact, the reason I got my current job is because I'd hit it off with the manager at a social event.

C Tamara, advertiser
One of the most important qualities we should aspire to in our professional lives is reliability. It rubs me up the wrong way when colleagues let me down with their broken promises. It's far easier to carry out tasks if you work in collaboration with others, but you need to be able to rely on them. In my opinion, it's no good saying you're going to do something, then having second thoughts about it. This is why employers are so keen on their employees being fully committed team players. That said, in order to know whether you can make the right level of commitment, you do need to be constantly evaluating your career. Not only should you be asking whether you like your job, but you should also be asking yourself whether you're earning enough money or whether there are sufficient opportunities for promotion. It's not a question of being disloyal to your team, but of looking out for your own best interests.

D Ricardo, conservationist
I remember being told early on in my career that everyone you meet is an opportunity to expand your professional horizons. Admittedly, I didn't fully understand what they meant at the time, but it's turned out to be one of the most valuable things I've learnt. For instance, once I was volunteering on a small conservation project and I clicked with another volunteer who was also an academic. Only later did I find out that she was the head of a conservation charity who was able to help me get paid work in the sector. That's not to say you should rely exclusively on your contacts for your professional success. If you just do the jobs that other people recommend to you, you'll probably end up stuck in a rut. Instead, you need to figure out what motivates you and develop the skills and knowledge to make that happen. Personally speaking, although I graduated from university more than two decades ago, I've never stopped learning and trying to improve myself.

4 Read the article again. Are the statements True (T) or False (F)?

1 Susan doubts that most people have the natural ability to ask questions about the world. T / F
2 Susan finds it frustrating when companies make lots of demands of their employees. T / F
3 Dejan thinks chefs would benefit from spending more time thinking about their careers. T / F
4 Dejan benefitted from a career opportunity after forming a relationship outside of work. T / F
5 Tamara believes that questioning your working conditions reflects a lack of commitment to your team. T / F
6 Ricardo found an early piece of advice invaluable for his professional development. T / F
7 Ricardo thinks you should take the initiative with your career to avoid becoming too fixed in one place. T / F
