Sustainable cities: Nordhavn, Copenhagen

Nordhavn is a new district being developed in the port area of Copenhagen. Situated on the Øresund coast, it used to be a busy industrial port until the 1970s. Although it's the largest port for cruise ships in northern Europe, there's much less industrial activity these days. For this reason, local authorities took the decision to modernise the area and provide residences and workspaces for 80,000 people. The project won't be finished until 2050 but several thousand people have already moved into Nordhavn, which has become one of the most expensive residential areas of Copenhagen.

Experts agree that blue spaces, or urban spaces dominated by water, may have even more health benefits than green spaces. For that reason, the old port area, created from a series of islets, or small islands, with canals running between them, is the perfect site for property development. The idea is to develop the islets one at a time, preventing the area from becoming too spread out, which would stop inhabitants moving between home, work and leisure facilities easily. The current developers are also keen to merge new buildings with the old industrial ones, such as factories and cranes used for unloading ships, preserving the identity of the area. However, they recognise that needs and fashions may change in a few years' time. By developing the islets one by one, future generations will also be able to influence the design and use of the space.

In an attempt to make the development as sustainable as possible, attention has been paid to green spaces as well as blue spaces. 'Pocket parks', small green spaces accessible to the public, have been built into residential and office areas, while much larger green spaces separate those areas from the cruise ship harbours. The green spaces will provide homes for wildlife, as well as reduce the risk of floods during heavy rain. However, the planners aren't only relying on nature to make the area more sustainable. They are also using data intelligently to help them meet their goals. They have designed a hi-tech data centre which helps authorities manage the use of energy. As a result, they have modernised heating systems and refurbished old buildings to be more energy efficient.

The district is also intended to be a convenient and comfortable place for the people working and living there. Urban planners have made sure cyclists and pedestrians are the priority in Nordhavn. There are more kilometres of cycle lanes than roads meaning no one should find themself more than 400 metres from public transport. As a result, the district's inhabitants benefit from reduced air and noise pollution. What's more, a range of leisure activities have been included, such as the harbour baths, where people can swim in the sea. An old industrial site will also be converted into a huge cultural space in the largest refurbishment project in Scandinavia. Known as the Tunnel Factory, the site will be surrounded by 'urban nature' and will include performance spaces, restaurants and playgrounds.

The Nordhavn project takes urban planning to a whole new level. It promises to be one of the most sustainable developments in the world, with its blue and green spaces benefitting the residents' mental and physical health. Its aim to become a 'five-minute city', where no one needs to walk more than five minutes to reach public transport, could also show us how to reduce our dependence on cars. Urban planners will be watching with interest to see how Nordhavn develops over the next few decades.
