Sustainable cities: Cheonggyecheon, Seoul

Cheonggyecheon is a narrow river running through the centre of Seoul. Since the 15th century, it had been used for carrying wastewater out of the city. It was dirty and ugly, with a neighbourhood of slums lining the banks of the polluted river. In the 1950s, local authorities decided to cover up the river by building a road system on top of it. The slums were demolished and new buildings were constructed, and over the next few decades an unattractive industrial area had developed around it. By the early 2000s, many of the city's inhabitants were demanding its modernisation. In 2003, the road system was removed and the Cheonggyecheon river was restored.

The restoration project improved the area in many ways, not least the fact that there is no longer a polluted river running through the city. Engineers were careful to recycle materials from the demolished road system, such as steel and concrete, and the banks of the river were designed to provide protection against flooding, which can be a problem in the winter months. It was also designed to attract plant and animal species to the area and, since its construction, many new species of birds, fish and insects have made the river their home. People living and working in the area have benefitted as well. It's much cleaner than it used to be, and it's even cooler than other parts of the city, thanks to the cooling effect of the water.

The cleaner air is a result of the reduction of traffic in the area. Previously, the road system had allowed thousands of cars to cross the city centre, so removing it created the problem of what to do with the traffic. The solution was to modernise the public transport network and encourage drivers to take the bus instead. 'Rapid Transit Lines' were created with special bus lanes and a fleet of 'clean' buses to further reduce pollution. Apart from reducing traffic coming into the city, the restoration of the river has had the effect of merging the north and south of the city, which had been divided by the old road system. Now the area around the river attracts visitors from all over Seoul, as well as thousands of tourists, who take walks along the river, have picnics, or visit replicas of the old houses.

Beyond the environmental and social benefits, property prices have increased and more jobs have been created in the new shops and businesses appearing in the area. What's more, the local economy is likely to continue growing as a result of the project. While some people have criticised the cost of restoring the river, it has been pointed out that the old road system would have cost a lot to maintain, but it wouldn't have attracted as much new business.

The Cheonggyecheon project is an example of how an ambitious project can be carried out quickly and effectively. For fifty years, cars had dominated the urban landscape, but in just a couple of years, the area was completely transformed. The planners imagined a place which would improve the lives of the city's inhabitants while respecting the environment. This project has clearly achieved that aim in many ways and it will serve as a useful model for urban planners in other cities.

4 Read the article again. Are the statements True (T) or False (F)?

1 Cheonggyecheon was once surrounded by poor-quality and badly maintained homes. T / F
2 Inhabitants complained that the road system around Cheonggyecheon was too modern. T / F
3 Engineers were unable to use the materials from the old road system. T / F
4 The restored river has reduced the air temperature in the area. T / F
5 A new transport system made it possible for more cars to cross the city centre. T / F
6 Two parts of the city have been joined together by the restoration of the river. T / F
7 It used to cost more to buy or rent property in the Cheonggyecheon area. T / F
8 Everyone agrees that the project was worth the amount of money spent on it. T / F
9 Cars are no longer the most common form of transport around Cheonggyecheon. T / F
10 The writer believes that the project has been generally successful. T / F
