Sustainable cities: Nordhavn, Copenhagen

Nordhavn is a new district being developed in the port area of Copenhagen. Situated on the Øresund coast, it used to be a busy industrial port until the 1970s. Although it's the largest port for cruise ships in northern Europe, there's much less industrial activity these days. For this reason, local authorities decided to modernise the area and provide residences and workspaces for 80,000 people. The project won't be finished until 2050 although people have already started moving into what has become one of the most expensive residential areas of Copenhagen.

Experts agree that blue spaces, or urban spaces dominated by water, may have more health benefits than green spaces. For that reason, the old port area, created from a series of islets, with canals running between them, is the perfect site for property development. The current developers are keen to merge new buildings with the old industrial ones, such as factories, preserving the identity of the area.

To make the development as sustainable as possible, 'Pocket parks', small green spaces accessible to the public, have been built into residential and office areas, while much larger green spaces separate those areas from the cruise ship harbours. The green spaces will provide homes for wildlife, as well as reduce the risk of floods during heavy rain.

The planners aren't only relying on nature to make the area more sustainable. They have also designed a hi-tech data centre which helps authorities manage the use of energy. As a result, they have modernised heating systems and refurbished old buildings to be more energy efficient.

In order for the district to be a convenient and comfortable place for those working and living there, urban planners have made sure cyclists and pedestrians are the priority. There are more kilometres of cycle lanes than roads meaning no one should find themself more than 400 metres from public transport. As a result, the district's inhabitants benefit from reduced air and noise pollution. What's more, a range of leisure activities have been included, such as the harbour baths, where people can swim in the sea. An old industrial site will also be converted into a huge cultural space known as the Tunnel Factory, which will include performance spaces, restaurants and playgrounds.

The Nordhavn project takes urban planning to a whole new level. It promises to be one of the most sustainable developments in the world, benefitting the residents' mental and physical health. Its aim to become a 'five-minute city', where no one needs to walk more than five minutes to reach public transport, could also show us how to reduce our dependence on cars.
