Blog: My life as a roadie
By Nathan Miller

Some readers have been asking me what it's like being a roadie. In this blog post, I'm going to tell you so you can decide whether it's the job for you.

1 ___
Some people think I just hang out with rock stars and go to parties. In reality, though, I rarely do that because I'm always busy. I'm responsible for setting up the equipment, like the musical instruments and speakers, and making sure it works. My job starts when we arrive at the venue and it finishes when we've packed everything away at the end. I have to deal with new challenges every day because each venue is different. We hardly ever relax because we're always on the road.

2 ___
I've always been into rock music and I used to go to concerts in my hometown. My dream was to be a performer, but I wasn't very musical so I knew that wouldn't happen! However, I thought being a roadie would be the next-best option. I discussed it with a band manager who said there were opportunities if I was willing to work hard. It didn't matter if I didn't have a background in music. Of course, I agreed and the rest is history, as they say.

3 ___
There's no fixed schedule, so I start working when we arrive at the venue. I have to take the equipment out of the trucks and set it up, which can take hours. When we've got that out of the way, I might take a break for a couple of hours. However, I'm supposed to stay at the venue in case there are any problems. My work begins again a few hours before the concert starts. I run around making sure everything works correctly. My day ends when the equipment is packed away again, which is usually pretty late.

4 ___
What I like most is being involved in something I love. Even though I don't play in the band, I'm responsible for making sure the concert is a success. I've worked with some amazing bands and it makes me proud to see the fans enjoying the concerts. Apart from that, I also have the chance to travel all over the world. We've been travelling around Europe for the last three months, and we're off to South America later in the year.

5 ___
The main disadvantage is that the future is uncertain as we only have temporary contracts. Some roadies complain because they think we're being exploited. They think it's unfair that we don't have permanent contracts. Personally, I understand the need to be flexible because the future is never certain. At the same time, I might not feel the same way when I'm older and I've got more responsibilities. If I had a family to support, I'd probably prefer a more regular job with better conditions.
