The Wiltshire Crop Circles

One night in 1976, Doug Bower and Dave Chorley came up with a scheme to deceive people who believed alien spaceships were visiting Earth. They regularly met on Friday nights and, on this particular night, they decided to create giant circles in the middle of a nearby field. They had heard about Australian farmers making similar circles with tractors a few years earlier. They thought it would be funny to convince people that spaceships had landed in their area, too.

Before creating their first circle, the pair drew a picture of what they wanted it to look like. Then they set off for the field with planks of wood and a piece of rope. When they had found the right spot, Bower stood in the centre holding one end of the rope. They tied the other end to the plank and Chorley walked around in a circle, making the crops go flat. They kept going around in bigger circles until it was the right size. The two friends created more than two hundred similar crop circles between 1976 and 1991.

At first, no one seemed to notice their work, but, after a few years, stories about the mysterious circles began to appear in newspapers. Experts confirmed that they were 'genuine', which meant they had been created by spaceships. They invented new words to describe the different patterns and they argued that humans weren't capable of creating such complicated patterns. One of these experts was a man named Pat Delgado. He wrote several books about the subject, which became bestsellers and made millions of pounds.

While some people were willing to believe that the circles had been created by spaceships, other people doubted this view. One of the first people to become suspicious was Doug Bowers' wife, although she was actually suspicious about her husband's behaviour. She noticed that he had driven long distances in their car and she wondered where he was going on Friday nights. When she made a comment about it, Bowers decided to come clean.

By 1991, scientists and governments were carrying out research into the origins of the crop circles. Bower and Chorley were worried that people were taking it too seriously and they didn't want to live the lie any longer. They admitted what they had done to a national newspaper, which arranged for them to meet the expert Pat Delgado. Before meeting him, they made one last circle, which the newspaper showed to Delgado. When he confirmed that it was genuine, the newspaper introduced him to its creators. Delgado was upset at first, but later admitted that he was pleased to know the truth.
