A challenging journey

In 1860, two men set out to cross Australia from the city of Melbourne in the south to Carpentaria on the northern coast. They were Robert Burke and William Wills and they hoped to be the first Europeans to complete the 3,250-kilometre journey. They knew it wouldn't be easy, but it was far tougher than they expected. During their trip, they faced challenges from the weather, the land, and their own bad decisions.

Although Burke had little experience, he was the leader of the expedition. Wills was the navigator, in charge of choosing the route. They spent several years planning the journey, and organising the equipment they would need. They weren't going to travel light, though. They took eight tonnes of food, a solid wood table and even a large bath! In total, there were 19 men, 23 horses and six wagons, which are vehicles pulled by horses. They also took camels in order to transport the equipment because they were used to hot, dry conditions.

In August 1860, the group left the Royal Park in Melbourne. However, they immediately had some difficulties when one of the wagons broke. It took more than a day to leave the city. After that, they made slow progress despite acceptable weather conditions. The problem was that they had so much equipment. They needed to break the journey on several occasions, each time leaving more and more equipment behind. When they arrived at a place called Cooper Creek, Burke, Wills and a few other men decided to try and complete the expedition on their own.

With little food and water, they struggled on towards the north coast. However, the land there was so wet that the camels couldn't walk on it. Leaving them behind, Burke and Wills carried on, but they were unable to achieve their goal. Soon they had to turn around and go back to their team. However, when they got back to Cooper Creek, the rest of their team had gone. Although they had left only hours earlier, Burke and Wills were too tired to follow them.

The journey was a disaster for Burke and Wills, and many of the problems were their own fault. They were proud men who had rejected help at various stages of the journey. They had also stopped trusting each other and even attacked one of their men for taking food. However, their expedition did result in success for a man called William Landsborough, who led a team to rescue Burke and Wills. Although he couldn't save them, he managed to complete the journey from Melbourne to Carpentaria. He was awarded £2,000 for his achievement!
