A challenging journey

In 1860, Robert Burke and William Wills set out to cross Australia from the city of Melbourne in the south to Carpentaria on the northern coast. They hoped to be the first Europeans to complete the 3,250-kilometre journey. They knew it wouldn't be easy and during their trip, they faced challenges from the weather, the land, and their own bad decisions.

Although Burke had little experience, he was the leader of the expedition while Wills was the navigator. They spent several years planning the journey, and organising the equipment needed. They weren't going to travel light, though. They took eight tonnes of food, a solid wood table and even a large bath! In total, there were 19 men, 23 horses and six wagons. They also took camels to transport the equipment as they were used to hot, dry conditions.

In August 1860, the group immediately had some difficulties when one of the wagons broke after leaving Melbourne. After that, they made slow progress despite acceptable weather conditions. The problem was that they had so much equipment and needed to break the journey on several occasions, each time leaving more and more equipment behind. When they arrived at a place called Cooper Creek, Burke, Wills and a few other men decided to try and complete the expedition on their own.

With little food and water, they struggled on towards the north coast. However, the land there was so wet that the camels weren't able to walk on it. Leaving them behind, Burke and Wills carried on, but they were unable to achieve their goal. They soon turned around and went back to Cooper Creek only to find that the rest of their team had gone. Although they had left only hours earlier, Burke and Wills were too tired to follow them.

The journey was a disaster for Burke and Wills, and many of the problems were their own fault. They were proud men who had rejected help at various stages of the journey. They had also stopped trusting each other. However, their expedition did result in success for a man called William Landsborough, who led a team to rescue them. Although he couldn't save them, he did complete the journey from Melbourne.
