The problem with 'unboxing' videos

Leah, aged 6, is watching a video platform which is aimed at children. Her favourite cartoon has just finished and the next video is about to start. Another child, the same age as Leah, appears on the screen and holds up a parcel. 'I wonder what it is?' he says. Then, for the next seven minutes, the young influencer shares his pleasure as he unboxes, or opens, the parcel, which is probably the latest plastic toy. By the end of the video, Leah is yelling at her parents to get her one.

These videos, known as 'unboxing', are becoming a bigger and bigger problem for families. A lot of children are watching these videos without their parents being completely aware. This is because they often appear on children's video platforms. Parents might think their children are protected from advertising on children's video platforms, but that couldn't be further from the truth. Recent figures suggest that 78 percent of children have seen unboxing videos and that more than six billion hours of them are watched every month.

A big part of the problem is that these videos often look like home videos. They are presented by children, some as young as seven, which means children and, perhaps more importantly, their parents don't realise it is advertising. However, the reality is that the child influencers are usually being paid money to show their products. They're also getting very rich from it. It has been reported that one nine-year-old earned nearly $30 million in 2020 from unboxing videos. As a result, many people believe that viewers should be warned that these videos are just advertisements.

Some people are also worried about the bad habits that are encouraged by unboxing videos. Firstly, they make children think it is normal to be given presents every day. When their parents refuse to buy them the product, they think they are being treated unfairly. That's just crazy! Secondly, these videos are encouraging children to become consumers at a time when they are easily influenced. If children get used to consuming at such a young age, it could become a habit for life.

So what can be done about this problem? Well, maybe parents should pay more attention to what their children are watching on the internet. In some countries, rules have been introduced to put stricter controls on influencers. However, parents shouldn't just trust video platforms to control it for them. By limiting screen time, they can make sure their children don't see as many unboxing videos. At the same time, why not take the opportunity to discuss the issue with them? The more they know about the internet and advertising, the more responsible they will be as adult consumers.
