A history of transformation: The House of Menander

Mount Vesuvius is one of the most famous volcanoes in Europe, known for its violent eruption in 79 CE. Several Roman cities including Pompeii were buried in volcanic dust after the volcano exploded into life. What's special about Pompeii is that the extremely hot dust preserved much of the city, giving the impression that it has been frozen in time. The city, visited by millions of people every year, has been popular with tourists for at least two hundred years. One of its best-preserved buildings is 'The House of Menander', which was constructed in around 250 BCE and has since gone through various transformations.

Upon its discovery in 1926, the house was named after the Greek writer Menander, due to a large, colourful painting appearing to show him on one of the walls. However, the last owner is thought to be one Quintus Poppaeus because a bracelet bearing his name was found in the building. Between 1927 and 1932, restoration work was carried out, taking such a long time due to the enormous size of the house. During the restoration, volcanic lava and dust were removed, revealing painted murals, bodies of people trapped in the building, and many valuable objects.

The House of Menander was a typical residence owned by the Roman upper classes. Although the house was located within the city walls, academics noted that it was decorated like a suburban villa. This particular house was grand, even for the upper classes, and the house we see today is considerably bigger than the original. At 1,800 square metres, it occupied an entire block in the main trading area of the city.

However, it is thought that no one was living there in 79 CE because the newest coins found at the site dated from 37 CE. Evidence of building materials also suggests that it was being refurbished at that time.

The original house, constructed about three hundred years before the volcanic eruption, consisted of a few rooms surrounding an open space known as the atrium. It appears the house was then modernised about a hundred years later. Then, over the next two hundred years, several buildings were merged to create the huge two-storey townhouse. The surrounding buildings were also demolished to create space for an internal garden surrounded by grand columns.

Throughout the property, the walls are decorated with paintings referring to characters from Greek and Roman literature suggesting that the owner was a cultured person as well as a wealthy one. What is astonishing is the way these features have been preserved so well. The volcanic eruption of 79 CE may have caused a great deal of destruction, but the dust and lava also protected the site for 1,500 years. Although a great deal of work was carried out after its discovery in the 1920s, an earthquake in 1980 caused considerable destruction and the house needed to be reconstructed again. However, more modern techniques and materials have ensured that the house can now be viewed by visitors and its amazing artwork appreciated.

Social enterprises: Artime

Sandeep Ahmed interviews Thom Nugent about a social enterprise making positive changes in the community.

A

For us, the award is in recognition of all the hard work that has made Artime a successful social enterprise. It was set up fifteen years ago by a group of local artists to promote arts and crafts in the community. While they initially worked on a voluntary basis, as demand grew, it became a full-time occupation. At that point, they had two options – either register as a charity and depend on donations, or establish a social enterprise and generate their own income. They chose the latter so they could have more freedom to pursue their social goals. The company sells its goods and services for a profit, which is used to pay for its social programmes.

B

After completing a business management degree, I worked for a large bank. I wasn't particularly interested in working in finance and had always wanted to work in social development, but I'd been advised to get some experience in the private sector. While I was working at the bank, I worked in collaboration with Artime on a community project funded by the bank. I was really impressed with what they were doing and hit it off with the team. When I heard they were looking for someone to develop the business side of things, I jumped at the chance as I felt the skills I'd learnt in the private sector could help them fulfil their true potential.

C

Our main goals are to promote community engagement in artistic activities. These activities contribute to both personal and social development, helping improve employment opportunities. They also promote inclusion and equality by bringing different people together and create opportunities for businesses to engage with the community, and of course, bring colour to the urban environment through art. As we operate at a local level, we can adapt our products and services to maximise the benefits for everyone.

D

The range of things we offer is growing all the time, but workshops and courses for schools account for a large part of our turnover. We offer training and support for teachers, after-school art clubs for pupils and organise large-scale art projects with schools. We also offer workshops for businesses and they have been really effective in raising awareness of social responsibility in the local business community. The creation of art for offices provides further opportunities for local businesses and artists to connect.

E

In my experience, social enterprises have an extremely positive effect on the community and connect different groups of people, such as schools, businesses and residents. They are more sustainable than charities as they allow more flexibility when problem-solving. By figuring out how to generate their own income, they can continue to offer their services to the community. That said, it's essential they're organised properly as their success depends on their profitability, much like any other company.
